The 5th about Eight a-Clock in the Morning, the Queen arrived here from Moret, and entring her Apartment remained there till One, to rest herself, and to prepare to go to Chapel with all the Pomp suitable to the Occasion. The Musick and Heralds began the Procession from the King's Apartment through Francis the First's Gallery to the Chapel: These were followed by the Knights of the Holy Ghost, not in the Habits of the Order, but all dress'd in the utmost Magnificence. The Prince of Conti and the Counts of Charolois and of Clermont immediately preceeded the King; the Dukes of Orleans and of Bourbon supported the Queen. His most Christian Majesty was in a Suit of Gold Brocade, with a short Golden Robe of the Order: His Star and Holy Ghost were of Diamonds, as were the Buttons of his Coat, and the large Diamond that was formerly purchased of Governour Pitt made the Button for his Hat. The Queen having a small Crown on her Head, advanced slowly under the Weight of her Royal Garments, her Train being held by the Dutchess of Bourbon and other Princesses. Her Majesty was followed by the Dutchess of Orleans, the Princesses of Conti; and the Ladies of the Court closed the March. The Cardinal de Rohan performed the Ceremony of giving the Nuptial Benediction, with an Exhortation to their most Christian Majesties. The Royal Couple dined afterwards in publick, the Princesses of the Blood being admitted at the Table. In the Evening their Majesties were entertained with a Comedy, and a fine Firework: Sixty two thousand Lamps, placed in Rows, were distributed through the Parterre of the Garden Their Majesties supped in Publick; and about One in the Morning retired. On the 6th about Noon their most Christian Majesties went to Chapel, dined by themselves in Ceremony; and in the Evening took a Turn in the Park, the Queen in a Phaeton, the King and all the Gentlemen on Horseback: At Night there was a Consort of Musick, and a publick Apartment. The Beginning of next Week will be employed in receiving the publick Compliments: And then the Court is to go into a short Mourning for the Duke of Aoste.
